ABSTRACT:

...of economy-wide and firm-specific events on stock prices. The SMG2000 simulates wall street trading and enables the players to understand the stock market, costs and benefits involved in decision making, and other economic concepts. The Investment Challenge allows the players to trade stocks listed on the stock exchanges, starting with a capital of $500,000. Through facilitating Internet site review presentations in the class, the students would become familiar with the sites. Topics that could be discussed by the students in their presentation could include research and news, exchanges, brokerage houses, direct investing, and regulatory agencies. Article includes a table listing some Internet-based simulation games.

... rose 21 percent.

Some analysts and traders who have long been puzzled by Redstone's trading started paying particular attention after the deal was announced last week. That's because almost 90 percent of the $8.2 billion Paramount deal will be paid in Viacom stock, not cash.

The rise in the stock price made it far easier for Viacom to do the Paramount deal. The question is whether Redstone helped trigger the recent stock rally.

'People were looking at this even before anyone knew about Paramount,' said one analyst. 'It goes double now.'

News of the unusual trading hit Viacom's Class A share price, knocking it down as of Thursday morning to $61.25, off about...

Fitch IBCA is reviewing its BBB credit rating on Booker after food retailer Budgens scrapped plans to reverse into the ailing food group. And Fitch's 'rating alert negative' tag on Booker suggests there's a strong chance the credit rating agency could slash its stance.
Budgens' decision to spurn Booker came just weeks after supermarket group Somerfield ditched plans to bid for Booker. Analysts say the jilted company needs some positive news to restore confidence. A cut to its credit rating could hit sentiment and send the shares lower. The stock is already trading at its lowest level since 1984.

When to promote
Deciding when to promote is just as important as deciding what to promote. Intelligent timing calls for a careful balance of stock in proportion to customer requirements at any given time. It also means an analysis of sales by department, classification and item.
According to studies published by the American Newspaper Publishers Association, a great waste occurs in advertising because firms fail to allocate their advertising...

The contest is sponsored by the Star-Telegram's Newspaper in Education program and Merrill Lynch and is designed to introduce students to the stock market.

Schools enter classes and smaller teams. Each class is given a fictitious $50,000 to invest and each team $10,000. They pick stocks, decide to buy, sell or keep them and then track the earnings and dividends along with stock price increases and decreases over an eight-week period.

Grand prize team winners were from...

It's a safe bet that more and more people will continue buying more and more computers. But manufacturers keep building new plants -- recently,

Intel

...a single day -- and supply

eventually will exceed demand.

The question now, of course, is whether the nervousness has turned high-

tech into a bargain, or whether the bad news will continue to depress

prices

for awhile longer.

Good question. Merrill Lynch announced Tuesday that it's cut the

on Micron Technology from "above average" to medium term "neutral." But

Pacific Crest reiterated its "buy" rating on the stock, which was trading in the mid-$90s only two months ago.

Above all, don't panic. Long-term...

... Earlier this year, Food Lion purchased Hannaford Bros. in a $3.35 billion cash-and-stock purchase.

Last month, Food Lion shareholders approved the formation of a holding company, Delhaize America, that reflects its Belgian majority owner and is designed to help expansion into new brands.

News of the court's decision came after the markets closed Wednesday. Class B stock in Food Lion, now traded as Delhaize America, closed down 56 1/4 cents to $20.50.

One analyst, reached after the verdict was reversed, said she doesn't expect the news to hurt Food Lion sales.

E*Trade Group's ETrade, America Online's namesake online service, Microsoft's Microsoft Network (MSN) Investor, Charles Schwab's Schwab.com, and Intuit's Quicken.com site are highlighted in a description of 34 Web sites that help investors research their market moves, track investments, and buy and sell securities online. Although investment self-help sites are growing in popularity, online brokerages still have system problems due to large numbers of transactions clogging networks. The SEC recommends that online traders use limit orders instead of market orders in order to reduce traffic. Before attempting to do one's own trading, an investor should gain knowledge of trading in advance, but none of the online brokerages provide research tools that are as good as those on other Web sites. The World Wide Web is still an important component of investment management, even if the investor does not do online trading. Services available include portfolios that allow investors to track investments throughout the day. The best ones, including MSN Investor's, allow users to configure alerts based on price movements in any of the investor's holdings. ETrade provides the slickest, most advanced trading environment on the Web, and is a full-service online broker. MSN Investor raises the bar for portfolio management, while TheStreet.com provides breaking news and analysis, and The Motley Fool provides very good financial discussion.

Abstract:

WE KNOW INSTINCTIVELY THAT TIME SHOULD NOT BE WASTED, YET WE CONSTANTLY LET TIME FLY BY WITHOUT ACCOMPLISHING THE THINGS WE SET OUT TO DO. CONSERVING TIME IS SIMPLE. TO BEGIN WITH, IT IS IMPORTANT TO CONVINCE YOURSELF OF TWO THINGS. FIRST, THAT YOUR SENSITIVITY TO TIME PROBABLY ISN'T WHAT IT SHOULD BE, AND, SECOND, THAT YOU REALLY WANT TO USE YOUR TIME MORE PRODUCTIVELY. A KEY QUESTION TO ASK IS THIS - IF I HAD MORE TIME, HOW WOULD I SPEND IT. IF YOU HAD ONLY HALF THE TIME YOU HAVE NOW, HOW WOULD YOU SPEND IT. DO A SELF-ANALYSIS TIME STUDY. RECORD YOUR ACTIVITIES DURING THE DAY FOR A TWO-WEEK PERIOD. ALSO KEEP TRACK OF INTERRUPTIONS. THEN ANALYZE THE RESULTS BASED ON - DO YOU LIKE THE WAY YOU SPEND YOUR TIME, AND DOES YOUR BOSS LIKE IT. THE BEST ADVICE IN THE AREA OF TIME-MANAGEMENT IS THE WORD SCHEDULE, BOTH THE NOUN AND THE VERB. YOU'LL NOT ONLY GET MORE DONE IN LESS TIME, BUT ENJOY YOUR LEISURE MORE.

Abstract: Technical Trading Strategies Inc's Trading Simulator is a technical analysis software package for second-guessing futures trading advice, cross-check personal trading strategies, or learn about the futures market. Trading Simulator uses the Market Profile study of the Chicago Board of Trade futures. Trading Simulator has a graphic display showing current profile and recent price history on a selected contract, a menu to enter trade data, and a history display showing closed trades and profit or loss. Trading Simulator displays prices through time at user-defined intervals. The display is particularly effective with color monitors. Trading Simulator costs $395 and runs on IBM PCs and compatibles with 256 K RAM and two disk drives. MS-DOS 2.0 or higher is required.

Trading Simulator, Technical Trading Strategies Inc. 4877 S. Everett Street, Littleton, CO 80123, (800) 648-2232. $395 introductory price; the software runs on IBM PCs or compatibles with a hard disk or two floppy disk, 256K, and DOS 2.0 or higher.

TRADING SIMULATOR IS DESIGNED to provide second-guessing for futures traded on the Chicago Board of Trade (CBOT). The package allows an investor to trade against months of price history displayed on a personal computer screen tick-by-tick. It allows the alteration of the time interval for the ticks to hundreds of times normal speed, making it easy for money managers to apply advice generated by their other programs as the price display moves through time.

Trading Simulator uses the Market Profile study developed by Peter Steidlmayer of CBOT. Although the manual provided with Trading Simulator is adequate for its use, novice traders will want to obtain a CBOT Market Profile manual which is sold in many large bookstores. This manual enables a novice to develop an adequate understanding of Market Profile before using Trading Simulator to test trading strategies.

The system is copy protected and can only be installed three times but is otherwise easy to set up. The data files available on an investment manager's system are displayed on the screen for easy selection.

Before beginning a session or at any time while the package is running, the default for the time required to playback a day's session can be changed. For U.S. Treasury bonds, a setting of one would require six hours to play back, 10 would require 36 minutes, and 200 would require two minutes. The time period for the determination of time/price opportunities (TPO's) is initially configured as 30 minutes.

Graphic Display

The essence of Trading Simulator is a graphic display showing the current profile and recent price history on a selected contract, a menu to enter trade data, and a history display showing closed trades and profit or loss. The $395 purchase price of the system includes some data files, including soybeans, the October S&P and October bonds. Additional month-by-month data is also available for most other markets from Technical Trading Strategies or can be downloaded day-by-day into a computer from an on-line service.

The graphic analysis of price tickmarks is especially effective on a color monitor. The market profile for the current day unfolds tick-by-tick with letters representing each time period during the day. The TPO and tick volume value area can be interpreted easily from the display. The system displays a running count of time/price opportunities, the ticks above and below the point of control, and TPO's above and below the point of control. The open and last price are displayed in reverse video.

Trading Simulator automatically condenses the prior day's data in three bars to the left of the data for the current day as the program continues to add data to the display. Open-high-low-close data is shown on these bars along with the TPO value area, and the tick volume value area. When the prior days prices are off the screen, the program uses up or down arrows to indicate their existence. Contract expiration and the time at the exchange is also displayed at the bottom of the screen.

Menu Selection

The main menu offers several options including a selection for trading options, printing, changing speed, restarting the display of tickmarks, and an exit to DOS. The trade menu will be used the most frequently by an investment manager testing trading strategies.

The selection of "Trade" from the main menu displays a lower level menu with specific trade-related options. Entering an "S" or a "B" indicates placement of a buy or sell trading order. The default is entering a trade for one contract but the number of contracts traded can be increased easily.

Trading options include placing the order at market, which will execute the trade immediately if the order is confirmed. Trading Simulator will delay an immediate order by the time slippage specified under the default and place the order at the worst of the next three ticks to make the simulation as realistic as possible.

Placing a limit order to trade at a specific price, or better, is another option. The stop order option will trade at the market when the user selects a price. When the stop order option is selected any buy orders entered must be above market and sell orders must be below the market. The last trading option is to choose to trade at the close. Results of the trading transactions entered can be monitored through the history option.

Selecting history from the trade menu will show all the closed trades. Cumulative profits are also displayed taking into account the day and overnight commissions as established in the default menu. Options are to display the history report on the screen, write it to a file, or print it. Any open orders remaining at the end of the day will be cancelled.

If the user wants a way to second-guess the futures trading advice generated by one of these programs or to cross-check personal trading strategies, Trading Simulator may be a good option. It is also a good choice for someone wanting to learn about the futures market from the safety of their computer screen without the emotional interplay of the pit.

Abstract: Artificial intelligence (AI) techniques are anticipated to change the capabilities of programmed trading systems and have been incorporated into many software categories, including spreadsheets. AI technology supported by spreadsheet packages today includes natural language processing, and parsing, a method of breaking programming statements into machine translatable instruction. Standard spreadsheet options found in state-of-the-art packages include fast recalculation, expanded memory support, macro features, and graphics. Although spreadsheet leader Lotus 1-2-3 has an installed base of more than 3 million users, many companies such as as Borland and Microsoft who seem to be the bet candidates to challenge Lotus, are vying for a market share.

ABC'S OF SPREADSHEETS MOVE BEYOND 1-2-3'S

AI techniques are changing what we expect from trading systems, portfolio analysis packages, and many other software categories as capabilities have increased beyond mere record-keeping and simple analysis to expert systems that can provide assistance with decision making.

Spreadsheets have become as widely used on Wall Street as other securities and investment industry specific packages, because they are used for every conceivable form of financial analysis.

It might seem that the time has come for spreadsheets to incorporate some of the AI techniques being used in the vertical market packages and in small ways it has. Natural language processing is an AI technique that in a limited way has found its way into some of the packages. Parsing--the process of breaking programming statements into basic bits that can be translated into machine instructions--is another technique once thought to be part of AI, that has entered the mainstream and is now used in spreadsheet packages to process data imported from other packages into appropriate entries in spreadsheet cells.

Other AI features, such as rule sets, forward and backward chaining, and inference engines are not part of any existing spreadsheet and are unlikely to be added to a tool that users have come to expect to be general purpose.

Rule sets are pre-defined If-Then statements, where If represents a condition and Then suggests a cause or action, as the case may be. Guided by a knowledge base of such statements, a computer may analyze information. If the If-Then analyses proceed backward to trace the cause of a given situation, the inference process is called backward chaining. If the rule sets are designed to offer clues to where a given development may lead next, the inference process takes a forward chaining approach. Perhaps a particular industry segment will explore these implementation options at a later time.

The lack of changes reflecting AI techniques is not limited to spreadsheet technology. Although the earliest implementations in the 1980s and the row and column orientation, they were nothing like today's products. Back then a cryptic series of individual letters represented menu options, size and speed were not much compared with current offerings, and there was a limited set of features; the contrast with recent products makes it obvious that there have been many significant changes in the last decade.

The level of change in the last year has not slowed. New and better features and more and more packages offer users many options. We have come to expect standard features such as fast recalculation, expanded memory support and a wide variety of functions, among them macro features and graphics. Although an installed base of over 3 million users still gives Lotus 1-2-3 the edge in this market, there are many firms competing for a share of this large market.

According to Bill Higgs, vice president and director of software research at InfoCorp, the worldwide end-user sales of DOS-based spreadsheet products in 1987 was $695 million with a volume of 1.5 million units including both upgrades and new units. Although there is a large enough market for many firms to survive, at this time, two new entrants into the spreadsheet market seem to have the best chance to change Lotus's dominant position in the corporate market to an oligopoly. A look at 1-2-3's current position, two major contenders, and the variety of other offerings will provide a glimpse at the variety which exists in today's spreadsheet products.

Product of the Year

Although there are other companies that have sold more copies of their spreadsheet program than the new Borland Quattro and Microsoft Excel packages, these new offerings seem to be the best candidates to challenge 1-2-3 in the spreadsheet market. Both companies are major forces in the microcomputer software market with excellent retail distribution channels, enough cash flow to make major advertising investments, and products that offer spreadsheet users the features they seem to be looking for. The critical factors that must be considered are increasing user awareness of offerings and the ability to make it to the approved buy list for large securities and investment firms, other financial organizations, and government agencies.

Microsoft's new Excel product was introduced in the late fall of 1987 and is definitely the most advanced product on the market today with its graphical interface and many new features. It won the product of the year award from InfoWorld and shared PC Magazine's Technical Excellence Award with the Lucid 3-D spreadsheet. Excel is designed to take advantage of the new 286 and 386 machines although it will also run on an IBM AT or clone. Microsoft's Windows program, which is a forerunner of the OS/2 Presentation Manager, is also supported.

Pete Higgins, group product manager for spreadsheets at Microsoft Corp., Redmond, Wash., indicates that three fourths of the Excel users are former users of 1-2-3 and Symphony who converted for a more powerful product. He relates that he feels there are five areas where Excel overpowers any of the competitive offerings: features that support raw analysis, such as linking and consolidation, audit tools, more functions, minimal recalculation and a spreadsheet that is bigger and faster. In addition, Excel offers the ability to generate presentation-quality forms, annual reports, and a wide range of graphics, as well as, customization for the user interface; compatibility with 1-2-3; and a graphical interface with support for Windows 2 that would allow users to learn one interface compatible with other applications. This would put them a step ahead in any future transition to the OS/2 Presentation Manager.

Jack Dreiss is an audit partner at Arthur Anderson in Chicago where they recently made a conversion from 1-2-3 to Excel with the purchase of 4,000 units. Dreiss was involved in the decision to make the switch and is a current user of Excel. He mentions the Windows platform that Excel offers as one reason for making the switch. He states that this will provide a consistent user interface that would be both easier to use and would be consistent as new applications were added, lowering the training cost for new applications. In terms of specific spreadsheet features, Dreiss cites the windowing and linking options, text handling, and the graphic environment as other important considerations. Arthur Anderson established a four-hour training session to expedite the conversion process for existing users and he asserts that the graphical interface made training new user easier.

Cheryl Currid, manager of departmental computing systems, at Coca-Cola Foods in Houston, has taken another tactic with Excel. She is testing the waters with Excel and making it available as an option to users who request it and has found that users at one end or the other on the experience spectrum have requested Excel. Although Currid relates that it is never fun to change horses, the great platform which Excel offers, its ability to read and write 1-2-3 files, and its graphical interface have made it worthwhile.

Excel has more power and features than the average spreadsheet user may require, but the financial analyst or portfolio manager will be especially interested in its print features that can support annual report quality output. A gallery of 44 chart types, the ability to display and link multiple worksheets, 131 built-in functions, 224 macro functions, intelligent recalculation, and 16,384 rows make it a product that excels when compared to other existing products. The company reports that sales for this product have been good, but 1989 may be the year companies migrate toward the new technology required to utilize this product effectively.

Lower-cost Alternative

Quattro, from Borland International, Scotts Valley, Calif., offers users of existing technology a lower-cost alternative that provides all of 1-2-3 Release 2.01's current features and a few new options. With a suggested retail price of $247.50, Quattro lists for half of 1-2-3's current price. With its full compatibility with 1-2-3 spreadsheets, it may well be the choice for individuals wanting a compatible spreadsheet for home use or those that need additional copies of spreadsheets for use in the office.

For long-term viability, Rob Dickerson, vice president of product management at Borland indicates that Borland intends to be a technology leader in the spreadsheet arena and work is underway on another release of Quattro. It appears that Borland intends to keep pace and perhaps even lead the way in establishing new frontiers for spreadsheet software.

Rick Guggemos at American National in Chicago is a former user of 1-2-3 who made the switch to Quattro. He relates he originally purchased Quattro as a low-cost product for home use that would be compatible with 1-2-3 at the office. He subsequently also switched to Quattro at the office because he explains it offers audit trail features and better print and graphics support than 1-2-3 Release 2.01. Guggemos also states that in his office there were still users of 1-2-3 Release 1A as well as some Symphony users and since Quattro made it easier to work with data in these other formats than 1-2-3 Release 2.01, he was at least considering switching the entire office to Quattro.

Quattro offers a recalculation feature that is different from Lotus's Speedup or Microsoft Excel's minimal recalc feature. Both of these other products have a row or column orientation whereas Quattro is able to create dependency maps at the cell level. Which method is best depends on the individual spreadsheet and the cell being changed. With a change that affects 25 percent or less of the spreadsheet, Borland's method is the most efficient. With more than 25 percent affected by a change in a cell, Microsoft or Lotus will have the most efficient method. Quattro's native menu provides a logical interface for all the spreadsheet's features. There is also the option to continue with a menu interface that matches 1-2-3's or to build any interface wanted. Customization options abound with this package since the screen can be changed in color or in structure in almost any way desired.

Other Quattro strengths include its ability to maintain a log file with transaction roll-back features available. An auto-record feature to automate tasks and other macro debugging tools are also available.

A Popular Position

One of the most popular spreadsheet products, and one that has been dominant in the marketplace is from Lotus. The current Release 2.01 of Lotus's most popular spreadsheet product may fall short in a few areas when compared to the new Borland and Microsoft offerings, but Lotus is planning several new releases of 1-2-3 in an attempt to maintain its dominant position in the marketplace. The recently delayed upgrade to 1-2-3 Release 3.0 will not be available until the fourth quarter of 1988 but the firm is also working on the mainframe version of this product and a graphics version to run under Presentation Manager 1-2-3.

The potential exists for a large number of users to switch to other products rather than wait for Lotus, although some spreadsheet users may not find their current packages deficient. But there are other users who are looking for immediate solutions for linking, minimal recalculation, and better graphics and print capabilities. Several add-ins that may provide some solutions are Speedup, which provides minimal recalculation, or Freelance Plus, a graphics package that reads 1-2-3 graph files and provides enhancements, or HAL, an intelligent front end for 1-2-3 that accepts commands in everyday English and also adds linking capabilities.

Scott Tucker, the product marketing manager for 1-2-3, Release 3, shares some information regarding the position of the current version of 1-2-3 and Lotus's philosophy with regard to upgrades. He points out that it is easy for new 1-2-3 users to obtain help and because the product is so widely used that they can find classes in every city and are also likely to be near someone at work who already knows how to use the product. He also indicates that Release 2.01 continues to be a very fast spreadsheet when used with the Speedup add-in shipped with every copy of the product sold, or available at minimal cost for those that obtained earlier copies of Release 2. Tucker notes that the current version has more data space for user entries than any of the major competitors.

With regard to their future offerings, Tucker relates that Lotus was not anxious to make any drastic changes and wanted to make the transition to Release 3 transparent to existing users while still providing the most requested features to their user base.

Although Release 3 is not a current option, the list of features which will be added will make it an upgrade that many users will look forward to. The availability of 3D spreadsheets, and improved printing and graphics support are additions that should be well received by the user base. The LEAF facility for the creation of custom functions and add-in's should be attractive to corporate developers since it will tie into everything new that Lotus offers. The recently announced Blueprint capability will provide easy access to databases and will even include the possibility for CD-ROM data access.

Something a Little Different

There are a variety of other spreadsheet products available. Most are PC-DOS products but there are also mainframe products, Apple Macintosh products, and many others that aim to offer something a little different to the user. With so many offerings it is not possible to cover any product in depth. The intention is to point out some noteworthy features that a few of the options offer.

Lucid 3-D, from Personal Computer Support Group, Dallas, Texas, was the co-winner of PC Magazine's 1987 Technical Excellence Award with Microsoft's Excel. It is a unique offering that is run as a 90K memory resident program available to pop up on the screen at the user's request. Its small size is not indicative of its power though, since it provides 3-D spreadsheets that can be linked to any spreadsheet cell, user-defined functions, a notepad for each cell, an undo feature, minimal and background recalculation, and a programmable interface. At a price of $149, it is difficult to believe it has so many features.

Javelin, by Javelin Software Corp., Cambridge, Mass., was introduced several years ago as an analytical alternative to existing spreadsheet software. Its special features are its English-like interface for creating and reviewing formulas, the ability to add worksheets to a template with Javelin's ability to store the data and model logic separately. Javelin also offers a series of ready-to-use financial templates that cover forecasting, inventory management, cash budgeting, pension fund management, and other topics at an additional cost.

SuperCalc4 is marketed by the Micro Products Division of Computer Associates, San Jose, Calif., a large supplier of software products. The company's software is not widely available at the retail level and their software products are primarily used by installations utilizing their mainframe software offerings. Although their micro product SuperCalc4 is a state-of-the-art offering, their mainframe version may be of greater interest. Supercalc/MF is available to support spreadsheet needs in the mainframe environment. It supports spreadsheets up to 9,999 rows and 702 columns that are 1,000 sheets deep. SuperCalc/MF continues to provide a personal computer-style interface and supports data interchange.

Surpass was introduced in the fall of 1987 by Surpass Software Systems Inc., Novato, Calif., who designed it to capture a share of the 1-2-3 market with features such as network support at a much lower price than 1-2-3. Their networked version does not require a hard disk at every workstation and multiple unit and site licensing agreements make it an economy network solution. Three-dimensional graphs, 32 windows, built-in support for a video card that supports 132 columns and 43 rows, plus a slick file manager and file search option, offer significant functionality. The product seems to be efficient in terms of cell overhead and speed. It does not require state-of-the-art hardware.

Symphony is an integrated spreadsheet product, meaning that it offers additional functionality in the spreadsheet, communications, and data management areas that are not normally a part of spreadsheet tasks. Symphony, also made by Lotus, has the same high quality spreadsheet as 1-2-3. With the new release's enhanced word processing and data management support and its dominant position in European markets, Symphony promises to hold its own.

The Smart Spreadsheet is part of an integrated offering from Innovative Software, Lenexa, Kan. It is a full-featured product with a quick response time and a spreadsheet that offers up to 999 columns and 9,999 rows. Like most other offerings it supports expanded memory beyond the DOS 640K limitation. The underlying programming language offered by Smart is more powerful than the languages offered by many spreadsheets on the market.

There are a number of software products designed specifically for the Apple Macintosh hardware where the graphical interface has been an important part of all products. Microsoft's Excel product has been available for several years now and is the industry leader in this field. Lotus will soon be releasing a significantly enhanced version of their Jazz product named Modern Jazz.

Even without AI features, spreadsheet products are powerful and indispensable tools for most analyses. Although there are some products that will meet user needs better than others, it is difficult to think of a product that wouldn't improve productivity if one is not currently using a spreadsheet.

ABSTRACT: Agenda, $395 from Lotus Development Corp, is information management software that runs on IBM PC-compatible microcomputers. The important features are impressive. Unlike other database management software, Agenda does not require use of fixed data structures, its suitability for handling qualitative analysis of large information bases gives it virtually unlimited application potential, and it has impressive import features. Agenda's basic building blocks consist of 'items', 'categories' and 'notes'. When these are creatively combined with Agenda's 'views' feature, which provides many perspectives on data, and with Agenda's 'category management' feature, which facilitates organization of information, the package's flexibility and power become apparent. Competitive products include Ize from Persoft and GrandView from Symantec, but Lotus Agenda has a headstart based on product awareness.

ABSTRACT: Guru, an expert system shell package marketed by Micro Data Base Systems Inc, provides an entire development environment, interfaces with some conventional business tools, and will run under DOS and IBM XT. Guru offers advantages such as the developer does not have to be a LISP programmer; and it can run on a standard 640K systems with a hard disk. Rule sections of a Guru rule set has three parts: a name; a premise; and a conclusion. Options that Guru provides for consulting the knowledge base include: Consult command; menu selections; and natural language Chat command requests. The main advantage to using an expert system such as Guru lies in the fact that reasoning processes are kept separate from the knowledge represented so the system is easy to expand and modify.

Unique to Cue-Chart is the Holt-winter channel time-series technique which allows users to identify changes in price trends. Another unique and similar technique is the cumulate sum channel technique. Cue-Chart has extensive data management features which make it easy to add and maintain data and can use data formatted along Compu Trac standards allowing retrieval of on-line stock price data. Cue-Chart graphic displays are excellent. Cue-Chart runs on IBM PC-compatibles with 512 K RAM, a Hercules, CGA, or VGA graphics adapter, and a disk drive, all running under MS-DOS 2.0 or higher.

Trading Simulator uses the Market Profile study of the Chicago Board of Trade futures. Trading Simulator has a graphic display showing current profile and recent price history on a selected contract, a menu to enter trade data, and a history display showing closed trades and profit or loss. Trading Simulator displays prices through time at user-defined intervals. The display is particularly effective with color monitors. Trading Simulator costs $395 and runs on IBM PCs and compatibles with 256 K RAM and two disk drives. MS-DOS 2.0 or higher is required.
